

Temporary teachers take training time

IU student teachers learn the ropes in PHS classrooms

Like most years, student teachers have come to PHS to get teaching experience before becoming full-time teachers themselves.

This year there are five, each teaching through Indiana University.

Teaching with eighth grade English teacher Tammy Noble, junior English teacher Jaye Brewster and freshmen English teacher Pam Street is Eric Gloyd.

Gloyd spent the first semester with Noble, the first five weeks of the second semester with Brewster and the second five weeks with Street. Just 23, he has a B.A. in English and a Certificate in Journalism from IU. Gloyd plans on teaching secondary English after finishing college. At this time, he is unsure whether he will obtain any higher degrees in the future.

Jennifer Richardson is teaching this year with seventh grade science teacher Amanda Crews, biology teacher

Jill Taylor and Spanish teacher Rachel Wyatt.

Richardson is just 25 years old with a B.S. in Biology, a B.A. in Spanish and an M.A. in Ecology, Evolution and Behavior. Once finished with student teaching, she will be certified to teach life sciences and Spanish and hopes to teach grades 9 to 12. As of now, Richardson is unsure if she will obtain a higher degree, but knows she will continue to take classes.

"As teachers we have to keep taking classes to keep our degrees," said Richardson.

Joseph Wetzel is teaching this year with eighth grade social studies teacher Aaron Reckelhoff and world history teacher Joe Sibbitt.

Wetzel obtained a B.A. in history and telecommunications. After college, Wetzel plans to teach social studies in grades 9 to 12. Wetzel might go back to college later on for a higher degree.

Hailing originally from Oregon State University,

Joshua Albus is teaching with eighth grade science teacher Kevin Jones and chemistry teacher Scott Page.

Albus obtained a B.S. in Chemistry at OSU and then transferred to IU to get his M.A. in Chemistry. He plans to teach chemistry and maybe physics in grades 10-12. Albus is not certain whether or not he will go back to college.

"It's a big maybe, but it definitely won't happen anytime soon," said Albus.

Love and high school "love" scrutinized by Coe

Valentine's Day has traditionally been a day to share your feelings, stalk your ex-lovers and make a fool of yourself chasing that always escapable emotion we call love.

But as the band Haddaway so wisely asks us, "What Is Love?" Is it that cozy feeling we get when we're cuddling with someone we like and they return our feelings?

Maybe it is the perfect kiss during the perfect moment; a kiss so passionate that two people lose themselves and, for just a moment, feel as their entire lives have been leading up to this?

In its purest form, I think that love is the willingness to put yourself second in a world dominated by people who think only of themselves.

Love and "high school" love are two incredibly different things.

In high school, guys use the word love to get what they want, and girls use the word to express what they think they feel because they want more than anything to be loved and accepted.

The truth is, as much as you all hate to hear this, "high school" love simply does not exist. Teenagers lack the maturity necessary to truly love somebody on a deeply emotional level. The word is thrown around so often though, and it is nearly lost all of its meaning because of it.

Love used to be something far deeper and less spoken than it is today. Renaissance artists immortalized their lovers in creative ways, drawing inspiration from their mates and creating wonderful masterpieces of art and literature. Does that sound like something that's common in high school romances? I didn't think so either.

Granted, there are some couples who seem to transcend the world of "high school" romance into something a little deeper... just not very many. And I'm not saying that the only way to show love is by creating an artistic masterpiece, I am just showing how much times have changed. What used to be immortalization in the form of art is now apparently a trip to the movies, paid for by your date if you're lucky. Where's the fiery passion in that? Where is the love?

It's with the adults. The adults are the people capable of handling a complex emotion like love, although sometimes this is very difficult for them too (and at times it even seems all the love has turned to a dark and wrathful hatred) but usually they still manage to find a way back to each other. Divorce is quite a bit more common than it once was, but that's because life has changed quite a bit. If it wasn't so taboo in the past, it might have been done more.

This isn't a love-bashing column, but a column asking people to open their eyes.

I don't care if a guy says he loves you. He doesn't really... he just likes you a lot at best. Whenever he's ready to spend an entire lifetime with you, grow old and die together, then he probably loves you.

Guys... well. I don't really have to say much to you. I know as much as any other guy that the "L" word is scary to us on a whole different level, yet we say it anyway because it's what the women want to hear. I guess I could do my part and tell you guys to ease up on it, but you know as well as I do it's just not happening. We do what we have to do... because we're men. If all it takes is a four letter word to get a fling, then so be it.

I promise you, all of you, we'll grow out of this. One day we'll ditch our hormones in favor of something a little deeper.
